DISCO GARDENING: TWO-EDGED ECOLOGY

The computer world is invading nature's world and you can reap the benefits of what an ingenious computer engineer has sown.

Engineer Leen Hoefnagels has discovered that the paper-thin, plastic disks for computers, called floppy disks, which resemble 45 rpm records, are far from a flop as mulch.

After slitting the disk with scissors to allow room for the plant to grow through the center hole, computer engineer Hoefnagels places it around the base of the plant or plants a seed in the center. Having used the disks in his garden for six months, Hoefnagels found that no weeds grow around the plants since the disks are opaque, there is far less water evaporation from the soil, water runs off the disks into the center hole, bringing water and dissolved soil nutrients to the roots. He also found that the "mulchettes" helped maintain a moist, humid soil climate and resulted in larger and stronger plants.

Hoefnagels uses disks rejected by the strict quality control of his employer, Information Terminals Corp. (ITC), one of the leading manufacturers of the information-storing disks. This allows formerly wasted material to be utilized organically resulting in higher vegetable yields—double-edged ecology.
